

JAMES HYDE

22 PORCELAIN PAINTINGS

In 2002, I was granted a fellowship at Greenwich Pottery House in Manhattan. For ten weeks over the summer I was given an unused, light-filled classroom for a studio, technical assistance and a variety of ceramic tools and materials.

By the end of my fellowship I had over twenty glazed porcelain polygons. I had intended them to be stand-alone ceramic paintings, but as striking as they were something was missing. Over the following ten years I would regularly pull them out from the corner of my studio to see if I could make something of these beautiful but unfulfilled objects. During that time my painting became increasingly involved with photography as a means of bringing observation of the world to my abstract painting process. When I revisited the ceramic tiles last winter, I found an unlikely magnetism between the ceramic polygons and photographic details of foliage – this became the basis for these 22 paintings.
